Model Irrigated Farm.

The easterners who visit the national irrigation congress in Ogden on the 15th of this month will have the opportunity of inspecting an irrigated farm on which the entire process and the results of irrigation will be fully illustrated.

Twenty acres of the grounds of a state institution at Ogden have been made into this model farm. A complete system of canals and laterals has been constructed and all the machinery for measuring water has been installed. All crops which can be raised on irrigated lands are growing on this farm including all forms of early fall fruit.

Commendable Enterprise.

The undertaking of the United States to transform the sand hills of Nebraska into a pine forest seems visionary. It is proposed that the government plant 100,000,000 trees where now is desert. Scientists are certain that these trees will grow and that the sand hills can nourish a forest.

Gradually the great forests of North America are being destroyed in the interests of the lumber business. Time will come when the supply fails unless steps are taken to re-enforce it from artificial sources. The area to be used in Nebraska is now a waste of sand. Yet it is declared that a few feet below ground is a rich soil, in which the roots of the bull pine, yellow pine or cedar can find the nourishment necessary to produce a large tree. Beneath the shade of trees the character of the surface soil would slowly change until eventually, it is believed, the entire area would become rich and productive.

Ten years will be required to plant 100,000,000 trees. Many more years must elapse before the forest can become a reality. But if it be true, as the professors of forestry say, that trees will grow on the sand hills, such an artificial forest will be a great boon to the second or third generation.
